A Self-Guided Walking Tour

Sully is the late 18th century home of Richard Bland Lee,
northern Virginia's first congressman. Richard Bland Lee and his wife, Elizabeth Collins Lee, lived here with their children from 1794 to 1811.

Richard Bland Lee and Elizabeth Collins Lee.

John and Alice, Ludwell and Nancy and their children, along with over thirty other enslaved people, overseers, and tenant farmers resided here as well. Many enslaved worked in the kitchen/laundry, smokehouse and dairy, while others worked the fields and gardens. Like other progressive farmers of his day, Lee used his enslaved labor force to transform a single crop tobacco farm into a diversified crop operation. During his ownership the estate included extensive fields of grains and grasses, pasture for livestock, orchards, a two acre kitchen garden and acres of woods.

Situated north of Cain's Branch, Sully consists of five surviving original buildings (the main house and four small outbuildings), one relocated historic structure, a representative garden, a representative slave quarter cabin and archaeological sites. Together they give a multifaceted view of the customs and culture of gentry class northern Virginians in the early years of our nation.

1. South Lane and Representative Slave Quarter Cabin

"Mark out the ground for the avenue of cherry trees, which I wish to lead to my new buildings in a convenient manner"

Richard Bland Lee, March 2, 1792

This very early lane may be the original cherry tree-lined entrance to Sully, and probably led southeast to a point along Frying Pan Road (present-day Centreville Road).

Aside from having "ever necessary house for labourers" with "brick or stone chimnies," little is known about the living space of the enslaved community. Archaeology revealed remnants of a small cluster of buildings along the South Lane. Their arrangement, along with artifacts, correspond to known information about dwellings for the enslaved community on other 18th century Virginia farms.

The current log dwelling (built on the 18th century "footprint") and communal yard make up a portion of the representative quarter. A garden would also have been present. Constructed in 2000, the structure provides a more comprehensive view of the enslaved community presence at Sully.

2. Log Schoolhouse

This structure was moved to Sully in the 1960s for preservation. The building dates from the first half of the 19th century and was originally a schoolhouse in Haymarket, Virginia.

Accessible route to outbuildings and main house starts here. This building is used for special small programs and is not open for viewing. Restrooms are located below this structure.

3. Stone Dairy

"Our dairy is an elegant apartment and answers our most sanguine expectations."

Richard Bland Lee, June 5, 1802

Built circa 1801, the building housed the dairy operations: cooling milk, eggs and barrel-churned butter. The red Seneca sandstone structure is embellished with galleting, a decorative technique using stone chips set in the mortar. Two-foot thick stone walls ensure cool temperatures. On the east side, crocks of milk and cream were stored in vats recessed in the floor that were filled with natural underground water.

A dairy annex was built and connected through the east wall for Edward Wagstaff, benefactor and Sully's first curator. Located in part of the original two-acre garden, the flower garden represents Elizabeth's fondness for gardening, what she called a "propensity to be digging in the dirt." Mrs. Lee grew sweetbriars, tuberose, convolvulus, morning glory and quamoclit (cardinal climber or cypress vine).

12. Piazza and South Side of the House

"The Piazza on the front, it is a very clever house ..."

Stephen Collins, September, 1794

Graced with a "piazza" (porch) and curved trim, this entrance is the current visitor entrance to the house. The Lee family and guests used it as an extended room for enjoying tea, needlework, conversation, games and more.

From here, one could see the barn, stables, and carriage house looking east. Pastures of cattle and horses, cultivated fields, and woods were visible south and west. Beyond the barnyard was the slave quarter.

Tour of main house starts here.

13. "Office" or "Lumber House"

A companion in age and size to the smokehouse, the original use of this building has not been determined. Possibilities include grain and tool storage or as a farm office.

A depiction of the Sully farm, house and outbuildings in 1801, based on modern interpretive evidence.

7. Covered Walkway

Using the original stone supports, the covered walkway was restored in 1975 to its early appearance. This feature provided a sheltered link between the laundry and kitchen to the main house. This walkway also separated the work buildings from the gentry family. Work of enslaved people such as Thornton (cook), Juba and Patty (laundresses) were heavily focused in the kitchen, laundry, smokehouse and dairy.

8. Cistern and Wine Cellar

On the west side of the house, below the double chimneys is a circular wooden covered cistern. In the 1840s, it captured rainwater for the laundry, garden, and livestock.

There is a door to the left of the cistern that leads to a two-roomed cellar beneath the house. Root vegetables and preserved food were stored in one of the rooms. The other may have contained barrels of wine, cider, and Mr. Lee's home-made brandy, produced from the fruit of his 1200 peach trees.

These structures are not open for view.

9. Drop Off Point for ADA access to short path to main house. No parking.

10. Gravesite

"I indulge myself a thousand times a day, in viewing the spot that contains two of the loveliest Babes that ever breathed..."

Elizabeth Collins Lee at Sully, August 19, 1796

Reflecting upon her grief, Mrs. Lee described the graves of her first-born child Mary and Algernon, eldest son of "Light Horse Harry" (Henry Lee III) and Anne Hill Carter. Markers commemorate these graves and that of a second Lee daughter. In 1978, the remains of Richard Bland Lee and Elizabeth Collins Lee were moved from Congressional Cemetery and reinterred here.

11. Flower Garden

"Often do I think of you so busily and happily employed in attending to the garden"

Cornelia Lee in Alexandria to Elizabeth Collins Lee at Sully, April 4, 1800

The revival-style flower garden was dedicated in 1978 to Robert additional space in the mid-19th century. The south doorway leads to a two-story work or dwelling space, possibly for enslaved family workers or an overseer. A fireplace is located on each level.

South side is not open for view.

4. Well

The "well in the kitchen yard" provided water for drinking, cooking, washing, and cleaning. To accomplish these tasks every day, enslaved workers drew bucket after bucket of water. The well measures 36 feet deep.

Please do not sit or stand on the well.

5. Smokehouse

Built circa 1794, the structure has the same flush bead siding as the main house. After meats were salted, they were suspended from crossbeams and smoked for several weeks to cure and flavor them. Barrels containing salted pork or herring may have been stored here as well. Meats were eaten by the Lees and some were distributed to the enslaved community.

6. Laundry and Kitchen

"The kitchen...is a finer one than is in twenty miles square and it is in fact a Kitchen and Landrey with very handsom chimney with cranes in them."

Stephen Collins (September, 1794)

A massive stone chimney with double fireplace divides this 1794 structure. Original cranes for hanging pots and cooking utensils extend across the stone hearths. Thornton, a skilled enslaved cook, most likely prepared all the family meals. Foods ranged from baked breads, roasted meats, fowl, and boiled vegetables, to elaborate pies, cakes, and jellies.
