

The Frying Pan Meetinghouse is significant to the local history of Fairfax County, primarily because the structure is the one remaining local example of eighteenth-century, vernacular, ecclesiastical architecture. Constructed between 1783 and 1791, the church possesses a remarkable degree of architectural integrity and serves as a tangible reminder of the important role the Floris community played in the history of Fairfax County between 1791 and 1867 as a focal point for religious and community meetings for both local whites and blacks.
